—you will observe that he changed the name, according to the custom of the country—is an Englishman? I admitted that he was the victim of circumstances and had had his misfortune. "Sir," said he, "one world more. How is a servant with a wooden leg?" "Great heaven, sir," said I, "how do you know?" "I should think, sir," said he, "it is possible." "It is a pity," said the Frenchman, "possible. Almost all the things of the world are always possible." "Sir," said I, "you may imagine any condition and I will send you my own absurdity by this time—that is true." He then took an immense pinch of snuff, wiped the dust off his umbrella, led me to an arch commanding a wonderful view of the Bay of Naples, and pointed deep into the earth from which I had found. "Below there, near the lamp, one finds an Englishman with a servant with a wooden leg. It is always possible that he is the Signor Loothere. I had been asked at six o'clock, and he is now getting on for seven. I went back in a state of purgation, and I am not to be deceived, and without the faintest hope of finding the spot. But as I was going far down to the lamp, I saw the strange staircase up a dark corner, with a man in a white waistcoat (evidently hired) standing on the top of it. I dashed in at a venture, found it was the house, made the most of the whole story, and, as the most popular story, I told it to the Signor Loothere. The host of it was that an nobody said find the place. Loothere had put a servant at the bottom of the Salita to wait for an English gentleman, but the servant (as he is presently pleased), deceived by the mustache, had allowed the English gentleman to pass unchallenged.—"Mr. Forster's 'Life of Dickens'."
